This video discusses the resurgence of mercenaries and private military companies (PMCs) in contemporary conflicts, drawing parallels with historical trends. The speaker argues that mercenaries are gaining visibility and importance in modern warfare, referencing events like the Wagner Group's actions in Russia. Historical cycles of mercenary betrayal and shifting loyalties are highlighted, alongside an analysis of how nations like China, Russia, and Turkey are employing these forces.

This video examines different types of mercenaries: private security companies, which provide defensive services, private military companies that augment military capabilities, and illegal mercenaries. It addresses the unique challenges involved in researching and tracking these entities, particularly in countries with strict regulations like Russia and China.

The implications of using mercenaries for military operations are explored, including their impact on state sovereignty and the potential for increased violence in conflicts. The speaker emphasizes that a new generation of mercenaries will emerge from ongoing conflicts, driven by technological advancements in warfare and cyberspace. Ultimately, the discussion concludes that the evolving landscape of mercenary use poses significant challenges to national security and stability worldwide.
